We're quickly approaching that day of lively chatter, wonderful smells and tossing a football out in the yard – Thanksgiving. I am looking forward to hosting the dinner in our home again this year. Even though all my children live in Raleigh, we don't really plan a time to get together often enough. In years past, we would load the family in the car and drive to Richmond so we could partake of an array of delicious foods prepared by my mother-in-law. She was the perfect one to handle the demands of a large feast like Thanksgiving. These days, the house has been sold and my in-laws are making their home in a very nice assisted living facility. Steve's brother will probably take care of the dinner up there and I'm sure their day will be as well organized and successful as it has been in the past.

Yes, I am looking forward to having everyone here again this year. I can't, however, guarantee that things will go as smoothly as they did when my mother-in-law was in charge. She loved preparing big meals for the family. She often told me that filling the role of wife, mother and hostess was the goal of her life and I think she was quite successful in all areas. She was adept at planning the meal and preparing everything she could ahead of time. She knew when the turkey needed to go in the oven and when to start the rolls. Like most of us, she had one stove so timing was essential – it doesn't work to just put everything in the oven and expect it to cook evenly and at the same temperature. She had a system in place and it worked well. Now, anyone who knows me will tell you that I am not a "schedule" person. I have a really difficult time predicting how long a task will take to complete. If there are people in the kitchen, I like to talk to them and then my schedule is lost. So things happen like forgetting something in the refrigerator until after the meal or failing to set the timer for the bread. I expect that as years go on, I will get better and these things. Hope so, anyway.

I have written two paragraphs about how Thanksgiving should go. It seems like I am only concerned with the logistics and not the intent of the gathering. Thanksgiving is not just the food and football games. It really is a time when families can come together and appreciate each other. We can take note of the wonderful things in our lives and in our world. It is a time of gratitude for a good harvest, even if we don't grow it ourselves. And for Christians, it is an opportunity to thank God for family, friends and things in our lives that make us happy. It is a time to thank God for the opportunity to serve Him by serving others. And it is a time to thank Him for His love for us – that never ending, always forgiving love that we hope to share with others.
